

Online Course Development and the Effect on the On-campus Classroom

Organizer and president: Pia M. Sørensen

Have you created an online course or module? What important pedagogical decisions did you make? What did you learn? How did the construction of an online course influence your on-campus teaching? Did you use the online materials to flip, blend, or otherwise change how on-campus students approached course materials?

Online course development and the resulting effect on the classroom is an important current topic for contemporary educators. This symposium invites you to join other instructors and course developers for an exchange of relevant successes, challenges, research findings, and practical examples in your approach to online education – and, where relevant, in your approach to bringing online course materials back into the classroom.
